

The dream lives on

Ben Jealous, NAACP <info@naacpnet.org>
Reply-To: info@naacpnet.org

Mon, Jan 17, 2011 at 8:53 AM

WWW.NAACP.ORG

NAACP

Megan,

Forty-eight years ago, four words were etched into our national dialogue that defined the destiny of a movement and changed our country forever.

I have a dream.

Decades later, three different but equally significant words would again alter the course of our nation's history: Yes, we can. When President Obama was sworn into office, the nation rejoiced in the name of justice and equality.

But despite this incredible progress, we still face great challenges.

We will continue dreaming, working, and achieving universal human rights. So today, in the spirit of Martin Luther King Day, I want to invite you to finish this sentence: I have a dream...

<http://action.naacp.org/YourDream>

Martin Luther King, Jr.'s legacy lives in the hearts and minds of all of us who believe the world can be a better place.

Whether it's a small-town girl inspired by Black History Month or a prisoner seeking redemption through rehabilitation, the core of Dr. King's message transcends boundaries and permeates the spirit of people today just as strongly as it did 48 years ago.

On this historic day, tell us about your dream so we can remember that America is a nation where hopes and dreams are realized.

<http://action.naacp.org/YourDream>

Thank you,

Ben

Benjamin Todd Jealous
President and CEO
NAACP

Donate | Join the NAACP | Blog | Take Action | Find Your Local Unit | Unsubscribe